Dear Esteemed Guests, Faculty Members, and Participants,

As we inaugurate our second International Week, I am filled with pride to welcome you to our historic Faculty, celebrating more than 150 years of academic excellence and community spirit. From our very roots, fostering international relationships has been embedded in our institution's identity, making this week all the more special.

In the true spirit of openness that defines our institution, we invite you to join us in sharing knowledge, enhancing our commitment to excellence, and our dedication to a future where the alumni of Szeged remain a vital part of global dialogue and progress. Enjoy a week of learning, sharing, and building bridges with our distinguished guest lecturers.

Thank you for being part of this exciting moment, and let the International Week begin!

Prof. Dr. Márta Görög
Dean of the Faculty of Law and Political Sciences

Welcome to the International Week of the Faculty of Law and Political Sciences of the University of Szeged!

Welcome to the International Week of the Faculty of Law and Political Sciences of the University of Szeged! We have always considered knowledge, science to be borderless and dedicated significance to learning from each other. The University of Szeged is committed to enhance the internationalization of Hungarian higher education. Through international programs, like Erasmus, Gateway and other scholarships, the exchange of students and professors are lively. The University of Szeged is one of the most successful universities in Europe on the basis of outgoing mobility. The accomplished exchanges not only contribute to the internationalization of the institution but also support the growth and development of the quality of education and professional life in Szeged.

The aim of the International Week is to invite professors from abroad to share their knowledge in Szeged, with a wider audience of students and lecturers. In the English and French-language international relations master program, the English-language LLM programs (in the field of investment law, and intellectual property law), in the Comparative Law Program, or in the English and German-language legal expert programs students have great opportunities to improve their professional language skills and to gain knowledge from Hungarian and foreign experts. Participation in the lectures and mini courses of the International Week provides the possibility to join in the international stream of knowledge by even those students who are not in one of the above-mentioned programs.

The Faculty of Law provides knowledge in a wide array of social sciences, in the field of law, political science, international relations, human resources, labour and social security administration. The lectures offered by the visiting scholars cover interesting and current issues from these fields. We wish an open mind to all participants and fruitful discussions!

Dr. habil. Anikó Szalai
Dean's Representative for International Relations

MALICIOUS CYBER ACTIVITIES IN THE CONTEXT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Proliferation of malicious cyber activities causes harsh consequences not only for the enjoyment of human rights as well as national security of states, but also may threaten international peace and security. At the same time the difficulties of attribution in cyberspace alongside with the growing use of AI to carry out malicious cyber operations may lead to misinterpretation of the situation and as a result to political tensions between states or even to a military conflict. The lecture addresses possible legal qualifications of malicious cyber activities and suggests possible measures of self-help that states may resort to respond them.

Dr. Nataliya MAROZ

Associate Professor
Belarusian State University

Dr. Nataliya Maroz, Associate Professor at Belarusian State University. Her research domain is international public law (in particular, international cooperation in the fight against cybercrime, international legal framework for cybersecurity, international criminal law, international human rights law). She is an author of more than 90 publications. Her last research project was dedicated to the malicious cyber activities and their qualification under international public law. The last book by Nataliya Maroz was a textbook on international public law (chapters on the principles of international law, law of international responsibility and sources of international law).

LAW AND CODIFICATION

This mini-course will deal with codification of the law. Codification is of interest both for its historicity and for its current impact on the regulatory frameworks of different jurisdictions. This mini-course aims to leave behind an exclusively local approach to codification. In doing so, it will adopt a holistic approach departing from various jurisdictions, thus achieving a global understanding of this fundamental legislative tool across time and space. A comparative legal historical approach helps to better understand codification. Reflecting on similarities and differences amongst jurisdictions and periods can help develop broader contexts, bridging disciplinary boundaries, while fostering knowledge transfer.

This mini-course will address methodological and substantive aspects of codification. It will first offer conceptualizations, to be followed by theoretical explanations of the shifts within codification. Attention will then be devoted to comparative legal history as a tool to identify those shifts. Experiences in Europe and the Americas will ultimately illustrate the malleability of codes, with a special focus to private law. The mini-course will conclude with reflections on the value of legal transplants for the development of codification.

Dr. Agustín PARISE

MARITIME TRADE AND COMPARATIVE LEGAL HISTORY

The Case of General Averages

General Averages are amongst the most ancient legal institutions in use today. While perhaps even pre-dating the Romans, General Averages are still of great importance to international commerce. For instance, the well-known case of the Ever Given - the large container ship which blocked the Suez Canal in 2021, causing enormous financial impact to international trade - was settled by way of General Averages. The amount paid was of 540 million dollars. The principle governing General Averages is simple: if a damage is incurred in order to save the rest of the ship and its cargo, then all interested parties must contribute to it. This simplicity, however, is only apparent: General Averages have been used by different people across different regions and historical periods, throughout a variety of legal systems. How did the same principle interact with different legal cultures across time?

The question can be broadened still: what makes a legal principle of commercial law change? Are changes driven only by economic reasons, or do other factors also play some role?

Please keep in mind that this is a two-part mini-course, each of which lasts 45 minutes and the two parts will be held on different days! First part will take place on Tuesday, the second part on Wednesday.

IS IT POSSIBLE A NON-COMPARATIVE LEGAL HISTORY?

Comparative Legal History studies experienced a notable development in the last decades. Some scholars even defend the existence of “Comparative Legal History” as a new discipline. Is that acceptable?

What is the contribution of the comparative perspective in studying the legal tradition? Is it possible a Non-Comparative Legal History?

These are some of the questions that the Professor will address in his lecture.

THE ROLE OF CASE LAW IN THE MAKING OF THE CIVIL LAW TRADITION

In “The Civil Law Tradition”, J.H. Merryman argued that the main distinctive feature of common law in the role of judges and case law, whereas the civil law tradition is more attached to legislatures and scholars. Is that correct? In his lecture, the Professor will explain how relevant have been - and still are - civil-law judges and their decisions in the making and development of legal institutions.

Please note that this is a two-part mini-course, with each sessions lasting 45 minutes and taking place consecutively.
